A Step in the Right Direction

For the past thirty-six years, we have provided our subscribers with information about organizations in computers and data processing. This, the 28th edition of The Computer Directory and Buyers' Guide, differs greatly from our beginning efforts.

In 1951 the Roster of Organizations in the Field of Automatic Computing Machinery consisted of 7 pages with information about 90 organizations. The 1955 Directory had 3 separate parts containing information about the people, organizations, and products and services in the computer field. The combined total of entries was approximately 8400 in 130 pages. But the information overlapped from one part to another, was produced slowly, and had often changed in reality before it reached subscribers.

Information for the 1951 and 1955 editions, and for all subsequent editions through 1980, was collected, updated, collated, sorted and produced manually. Updating and sorting happened once a year. Typing and pasting up of the Directory took so long that information was often 6 to 8 months old by the time subscribers read it. In the computer industry, whose motto is "Change," these methods could only make information less and less useful.

The 1986-87 Directory contains over 3600 entries of significant organizations. The listing is alphabetic showing each company's name, address, telephone, brief description of products and services, and if available, number of employees, year established, and top officers. All of this information is stored, updated, and produced by a microcomputer system. Because this system is effective and saves time and work, information is timely when it reaches subscribers. And there are other benefits from this system.

Production of printed editions of the Directory will be more regular in the future. We also update our database continually, so we can offer the following service to Directory subscribers:

If you are looking for information about an organization (with more than 10 employees) before you receive our next printed edition, write or telephone us and we will gladly give you what information we have.

We regret the lateness of this edition, and we thank our subscribers for their patience.

Categories of Computer Suppliers

There are three main categories of suppliers of computers and computer-related products. Determined by the type of computer involved, these categories are:

1. Extensive system suppliers: mainframes and supercomputers; systems can handle hundreds of users
2. Intermediate system suppliers: minicomputers, superminicomputers, supermicrocomputers; systems usually handle 16 to 64 users (although superminicomputers can handle hundreds of users)
3. Microprocessor-based system suppliers: personal computers, microcomputers, workstations, multi-user microcomputers; systems handle individual users, or 8 to 16 users

General Advice Regarding Computers

1. Determine what task or tasks a computer system can perform for your company. You may want to increase productivity, reduce costs, have more information about your business or improve the organization of your company. Whatever your goal, define the specific tasks that will be computerized.
2. Find the computer system (hardware and software) that will meet your needs. Investigate at least 3 local computer stores, computer dealers, and branch offices of major computer organizations. Examine computer literature: books, magazines, trade catalogs, buying guides, etc.
3. Consult friends, business associates, and acquaintances who are already using computer systems and who have requirements similar to your own.
4. Investigate, test, and qualify the computer system. Determine if it can actually solve sample problems for your company. Make sure it will do the tasks you want it to do.
5. Decide if the benefits of using a computer system will exceed the costs.
6. Never say yes while listening to the salesperson. If the hardware, software, or computer system as a whole is as wonderful as the salesperson states, then it will still be as wonderful in a few days.
7. Buy hardware and software from an established computer manufacturer or computer dealer who has good references.
8. Investigate contractual arrangements for continuing support AFTER you buy computer equipment. Estimate carefully what a service call will cost in the first year after purchase, and in the next 2 to 5 years after purchase.
9. Determine if the software you choose will be supported and by whom. Will that support cost you anything? Find out the software publisher's policy regarding updated versions. (It shouldn't cost too much to receive a new version unless the update includes a new manual and significant changes.)
10. Determine what will be the best way of training people to use the computer system. Will well-written manuals be sufficient or will formal classes be necessary? Estimate carefully the cost of teaching people to use the computer system.
11. Provide for change as your requirements or circumstances alter. Can you easily change or upgrade your system through the same manufacturer or dealer?
12. Provide for feedback about the computer system's effectiveness. Is it easily doing the job it should do and in a reasonable amount of time?
